It is estimated that the majority of installed measurement instrumentation is "smart". Smart devices today can provide more than just the process variable measurement provided by the 4-20mA signal. In order to maximize the investment in smart measurement devices, the intelligent device information should be available to operators and managers so that they can better manage their operations and lower operating costs. Without a better view of the diagnostic condition and status of their devices, management has a limited ability to know of potential device problems that might unexpectedly shut the process or plant down. This paper reviews and presents examples of the bottom line benefits available when using an FDT Frame Application and device DTMs to get early notification of potential problems – saving money and avoiding unscheduled shutdowns. One of the case studies presented below document savings of more than $800,000 by taking advantage of existing device diagnostic information.
